

Intention

What are your intentions?

Do you have intentions that you hold firm, day in and day out? Or, are your intentions one way for today and another way for tomorrow?

We manifest our intentions. However, to do so they have to be consistent intentions that we focus on and work towards. A quick desire that is here now and gone tomorrow is not an intention and not something that we can expect to manifest. An intention is something that we work towards during the good times and the bad.

Edison intended to create the light bulb. He found 10,000 ways that it would not work until he found the one that would. While the results were not overnight he did succeed. He kept his intention in focus and did the work necessary. Look at the great people in history and the lifetime they spent against great odds to fulfill their intentions.

Without focused intentions you will drift from one thing to another on the sea of life. People and events will take you from one thing to another and you will not find satisfaction or fulfillment.

When it is not our intention to succeed we won't. When it is not our intention to give it our all we won't. When it is not our intention but someone else's for us we will not give it the attention and focus we would were it our own intention.

Be suspicious of people who tell you they will try. Trying does not indicate they are willing to or believe that they can do it. The intention is not there and without the intention and the commitment to do it, one will find that success is less likely.

Beware of your intentions. Intentions are most likely what will be. Even negative thoughts and focus come into being. If we focus on the not wanting something it is in effect an intention and more likely to happen.

We need to guard our thoughts, what we focus on, and what we spend time on, as they are our intentions. Our intentions have a good chance of becoming true.

Without intentions you drift meaninglessly in life. Positive intentions produce positive results. Negative intentions produce negative results.